That 100-man organization soon became Company A of the Second Regiment, United States Sharpshooters, posted to the hard fighting Army of the Potomac. Like Colonel Hiram Berdan’s first regiment, the sharpshooters would account for thousands of enemy casualties.

Chase proved to be an efficient and valued officer, and by the summer of 1862 was in command of the Minnesota company. The sharpshooters saw continual service in reconnaissance, skirmishes, and battle. At Second Bull Run they were hard hit, and at Antietam ten more in the company, including Captain Chase, were wounded. By the spring of 1863 the Second Sharpshooters were among the most valuable troops in the Union Army and Chase himself had been in 14 battles. After Chase’s death the sharpshooters went on to essential work at Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Cold Harbor and Petersburg.

Captain Chase’s orphaned children opened the melancholy crate of his effects in 1863. Uniform, sash, sword, carved pipe and letters were distributed across the country with various descendants.

But the rifle stayed in Minnesota with Chase’s daughter and passed eventually to her grandson. He treasured the rifle and his great grandfather’s memory, as did Minneapolis Civil War veterans who had founded the Dudley P. Chase Post of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The present owner first saw the rifle in the 1960s and was impressed by the amount of documentation gathered by the family. But there was much more available on the service of the efficient Sharpshooter officer in National Archives service records, on the internet, and in recently published books on the combat history of the Second Regiment.

The rifle itself is a heavy barreled .45 caliber half-stock percussion target rifle marked “N. Lewis, Maker, Troy, NY”. Known to collectors as a New England target rifle, it retains a false muzzle at the end the barrel.

Designed to protect the rifling, the false muzzle was removed before firing. The double set triggers in a pistol grip style trigger guard and back action lock were precisely tuned for accurate shooting. On the left cheek is a silver inlay of a running buck.

Mounted to the rifle is the original 35 inch long iron telescopic sight marked “R. Haskell, Painesville, Ohio”. Weapons like this accompanied the sharpshooters to war, but were soon replaced by Colt’s revolving rifles and eventually by the better Sharps breechloading rifle.

But each company retained a few telescope-rifles for sniping and even the regimental chaplain was employing one during Captain Chase’s last fight at Chancellorsville.

Today, Captain Chase’s sharpshooter rifle can be viewed in the “Minnesota’s Two Civil Wars” exhibit at the Minnesota Military Museum. The captain’s grave in Minnetonka was recently rededicated with a new memorial stone by the Minnesota Civil War Commemorative Task Force.

Winter is the time for updating and changing exhibits at the museum. The seemingly endless work on the military badges exhibit is at last finished. When I started this project nearly four years ago I thought it would be quick and easy. I have put many hours into the exhibit, seeking badges from sources around the country, including PXs in the Twin Cities and Camp Ripley. Five museum volunteers have worked on the project.

Funding the many necessary purchases was aided by the generosity of Clifford and Diane Peet, and Dan Ojeda, Jr. Nearly 400 badges are now in the exhibit, covering the Army, Navy, Marines, Air Force, Coast Guard, and Merchant Marines. I’m sure someone will soon view it and complain that we left out their badge, and my volunteers and I have debated if we should award this person a prize. (We won’t.) With the addition of new LED lighting, we are all very pleased with the exhibit’s comprehensiveness and appearance.

Over the winter the 34th Division exhibit was modified and in early March it was moved to the new Camp Ripley Education building where it will continue to honor the soldiers of the 34th Infantry Division from 1917 to today, and into the future. The many weapons obtained by General Nash in Bosnia that had been part of that exhibit could not go to the Ed Center because of security considerations, but many have been integrated into the museum’s Arms Room exhibit.

Speaking of the Arms Room, some of the old exhibit on ammunition has been moved and some of it has been put in storage. That space has now been filled with a new exhibit of swords and edged weapons. Captions for that exhibit are now being made.

Work is moving forward on the updated and improved exhibit on women in the military. The biggest dilemma confronting me is deciding what to include and what to leave out. As in most museums, we have many more things to display—important things—that we have exhibit space. It is hoped that this exhibit can be completed by the start of our summer schedule on May 1st.

Work also continues on the major Vietnam exhibit that will open on 18 July with an event that we are now planning. Please watch for more information on this event and try to attend in order to honor our Vietnam veterans. If you are a Vietnam (Laos, Cambodia, etc.) veteran, please consider sending us one or more short stories (about one page in length) and some photographs regarding some aspect of your time in Vietnam. We are running out of time, however, so do it now. In the past, we have had some veterans show up at our doorstep with their things on the week or the day the exhibit opened, and were then disappointed when we could not fit them into the exhibit. We really need to have your stories/artifacts by June 1st.

Many other projects are being worked on as the museum moves forward on its mission to honor all Minnesota veterans. Many thanks to the museum’s great crew of volunteers! Their dedicated work has been instrumental in our ability to move the museum’s mission forward—getting things done that, not so long ago, I never thought possible.

DIRECTOR’S UPDATE
By Jeff Thielen

I always appreciate this opportunity to share with you and to update you on what is happening with the plans and goals at the museum. Sharing plans and goals helps build excitement for those goals and keeps us on task to make them a reality.

On April 25 we will hold our first “Teacher Appreciation Day” at the museum. We’ve invited teachers from across the state to meet with staff and volunteers so they see what we have to offer at the museum. We have partnered with St. Cloud State University to host a teacher workshop in conjunction with the event that will provide teachers with six continuing education credits and give them some great ideas on how to incorporate the museum into their class plans. We plan to continue working with teachers in Minnesota, expanding ways the museum can be a resource for students and teachers alike.

Another resource we have been working to improve for patrons and visitors is the museum library. Over the years the library has grown to approximately 14,000 items. There have been some great volunteers who have helped develop the library and we currently have a volunteer working 20 hours a week to organize the data base and complete an inventory of the collection. Her work is the first step in the process of opening the library collection to the public. We are now seeking funding to create a fully functioning library. It is our intent to improve the existing data base of items in the collection and make that data base available online. Although many items in the collection will never leave the library (because they are rare or unique, for example) and will be only be used under supervision, we hope to be able to create a lending library for at least some of the collection within the next two years.

One of the goals I have had for the museum since I first started here four years ago was to obtain a C-130 for display on the museum grounds. We will be one step closer to making that a reality in May when we host a site visit by a staff member of the National Museum of the United States Air Force located at Wright Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio. In order to obtain any aircraft from the Air Force, the museum must be officially designated as an Air Force Museum (this would be in addition to our current status as an Army museum). Our initial application in that process was completed last summer and was administratively qualified by the Air Force last fall. Once the site visit is complete and we are designated as an Air Force Museum we will be able to make application for Air force equipment, to include a C-130 Hercules 4 engine turbo prop aircraft.

If you have not visited in a while please make plans to check out the upgrades Doug Bekke and the curatorial staff have been working hard on. The Featured Veteran display is changed almost every month, the Women in the Military exhibit is new and improved, and a new special exhibit on the Vietnam War will be opening July 18. We’re looking forward to seeing you here soon.

Preserving Our films: Fighting Against Time

Did you know that the museum has a sizeable collection of 16mm, 8mm, and 35mm movie film? These films cover a whole range of subject and time periods, from the earliest known movie of Camp Ripley in the mid-1930s, to training films dating from the 1940s – 1970s, to amateur “home movies” taken by vets that depict their military activities. Unfortunately, up to now they have been stored in an uncontrolled environment, which will inevitably lead to their decay and loss (nitrate degradation for films made prior to the early ’50s and “vinegar syndrome” for later acetate films).

The cost of professionally conserving these films—which includes making a duplicate negative, a copy on digital tape, and a DVD copy—is high. For example, the National Film Preservation Foundation estimates that a 400 foot, 12-minute, 16mm film would cost $2,390; a 1900 foot, 52-minute film would cost $12,340! We will have to prioritize which films are most important to keep, and then seek grant funding for their preservation. In the meantime, our archivist, Chad Conrady, has halted further deterioration of all our old films by putting them in cold storage, which is the recommended procedure.
In my last column, I said that I was working on old St. Peter Armory records, the records of Company D, Second Minnesota Infantry, and the personal papers of Kenneth Murphy. These collections are now available for research and can be further examined by using the archival finding aids that are on the archive’s website: mnmi-larchive.org.

Last fall I started processing a large group of records pertaining to the Minnesota National Guard that came to the museum back in 2001.

Included in this collection are records for headquarters of the 205th Infantry Regiment and the Second Battalion of the 135th Infantry Regiment, which were once based in Mankato; records for headquarters of the 1st Battalion, 135th Infantry Regiment based in Rochester; and various units based in Stillwater, such as the Headquarters and Headquarters Company of the 1st Brigade, 47th Division, and the Heavy Motor Company, 135th Infantry Regiment.

We also have a large group of scrapbooks and photographs that cover such topics as Camp Rucker during the Korean War, military parades at Camp Ripley during the 1950s, annual field training at Ripley, and the 1959 Wilson Meatpacking Strike in Albert Lea and the 1985-86 Hormel Strike in Austin.

I have also processed a collection of materials that the museum received from the Minnesota Military Academy, which included yearbooks, graduation programs, and technical manuals.

We have been reorganizing our space. As I was removing a section of shelving in the archives, I ran across some boxes labeled simply “Miscellaneous Magazines.” The contents were not magazines. In them were assorted training manuals, prayer books, guides, personal notes, photographs, and post cards from various donations made from the 1970s to the 1990s.

Most notably they also included things that belonged to General Ellard Walsh and General George Leach. Since discovering these orphaned materials, I have worked with curator Doug Bekke and his donor records to reassemble them into smaller, more precise collections based on the topic or person who initially collected or owned them.

I know that components of these collections are scattered throughout the archives and/or the museum, so as I come across orphaned materials they will be reassembled in order to properly present the history of the individual the collection documents.

One of the things I learned shortly after starting work here is that Minnesota State Statutes (chapter 138.161 and 15.17) provides guidance to state departments and agencies regarding the control and disposition of their records.

It basically says that all state records need to be deposited and managed by the Minnesota Historical Society, but there is a provision that allows a state agency or department to specify, through an agreement, an alternative repository for a specific group of records.

The museum reached out to the Minnesota Department of Military Affairs and the Minnesota Historical Society to assist in resolving the issue of state records housed at the Minnesota Military Museum. A representative from the Department of Military Affairs met with the state archivist at the Minnesota Historical Society to initiate the creation of such an agreement between our three organizations.

From August to the end of December I developed and wrote a six-page agreement with the state archivist and her assistant to maintain and provide access to Department of Military Affairs records already housed at the museum. The museum had to agree to meet certain archival requirements, such as providing public access to the records and properly caring for them. In January the agreement started making its way for the signatures of specific members representing each of the three organizations concerned.

Because the law states that such agreements can only apply to a specific group of documents, the current agreement only covers those Minnesota Department of Military Affairs records currently at the museum. That means that any new records deposited by the department or any component of the Minnesota National Guard will need to have another agreement completed and signed down the road.

SUMMER HOURS
Beginning May 1, the museum transitions to its summer schedule: Open every day, 7 days a week, 10: a.m. – 5:00 p.m., including holidays.
We recently acquired a rare WWII 34th Infantry Division helmet from a collector. It has the Red Bull insignia painted on the front of the steel helmet and the liner and is complete with original helmet net. Attached to the inside back of the liner is a wool flap intended to shield the wearer’s neck from the sun. The flaps, unique to the 34th, were made and issued in Tunisia.

I once did an oral history with 34th ID Sergeant Don Mendenhall, who told me that most soldiers hated the hot, wool flaps and often “lost” them. Don also provided a photo showing men in his unit wearing flaps in North Africa. The helmet we acquired may have been brought home at the end of the Tunisian campaign or smuggled home later. When the war ended, soldiers were typically required to leave their field equipment behind. Steel helmets were repainted and reissued, so it’s very special to have this particular helmet and to know some of the story that goes with it.
